Special to The National Tribune:

The Census Supervisors.

Postmaster-General Hitchcock and Secretary of Commerce and Labor Engel have been toiling with the selection of Census Supervisors. They named about 200, and came on to Beverly to recommend the appointment of the 200. The President signed the commissions. They also placed before him about 100 more cases, and asked him to decide. He did decide a few, but most of the cases were turned back to them with the injunction to work on

In a large city. There is very little for sale. Old Boston families and a few families from other cities have acquired practically all the available property there is, and only occasionally does an estate get upon the market.

The President comes into the town of Beverly very little—not at all except when he goes thru on an automobile ride and when he comes in for church every Sunday at the Unitarian place of worship. The residents expected he would frequently come into the offices that have been fitted up splendidly in

He will naturally have three or four big speeches for his long tour. One of these will be on the subject of the low-tariff question of the Middle West, and the tariff. It will be in justification of the Payne law. All the President has to do is to say that he is in favor of the tariff statement made public at the time he signed the bill the afternoon that it was passed. He would not be surprising, say those familiar with the President's methods, if that statement were the substance of his tariff speech to be delivered before the meeting of insurgent Republicans in the West. The President, of course, will amplify this by saying that he is in favor of it.

There is much speculation as to whether the President will deliver a speech on the subject of the tariff in the West on conservation policies. Secretary Ballinger has announced that he is to travel with him all thru the Northwest, and Mr. Ballinger's friends are confident that he will have the President's approval of his strict adherence to law in carrying out the conservation policy. The question of the conservation controversy is becoming more and more heated, and possibilities of embarrasment to President Taft. The radical Republicans are clamoring for the removal of Secretary Ballinger.
